Robert Joseph Hehir was born at Payneham (SA) on 19 May 1918, the eldest of three children of John Arthur Michael Sarsfield Hehir and Annie Caroline Helen Hehir (nee Gourley). The family moved to Victor Harbor and Robert continued his education at Victor Primary, and Victor High School. He left school in October 1934. On leaving school, Robert gained employment as a house painter. The family was living in Victoria Street. Robert applied for air crew training with the Royal Australian Air Force on 9 March 1940, and although his academic record was not outstanding, he displayed qualities that were often sought by the selection panel – an outdoor sportsman, and in his case, his knowledge of signalling and morse code. Robert was enlisted into the RAAF on 17 August 1940.

He underwent his air cadet training at No 1 Initial Training School (ITS) at Somers (Vic) where only after four weeks training he was mustered for training as a wireless air gunner and sent to No 1 Wireless & Air Gunnery School (WAGS), Ballarat. Following intensive training lasting until early March 1941 when he trained further at No 1 Bombing & Air Gunnery School (BAGS) Robert was awarded his Air Gunnery badge on 5 April. A short stint of pre-embarkation leave was granted until the 16 April. Which was followed by his transfer to the embarkation depot in Sydney to await the next ship to the west coast of the United States and then onwards to Canada and Britain. His service file does not indicate how he travelled to No 70 Operational Training Unit (OTU), which at the time was based at Nakuru, Kenya. The OTU was tasked to train pilots to operate in Middle Eastern conditions and as such was equipped to train twin-engined crews for light and medium bomber training.

On 21 February 1942, Robert was posted to 14 Squadron RAF, which at the time was based in Egypt, flying the twin-engine Bristol Blenheim MkIV's. No 14 Squadron had returned to operations in the Western Desert in October 1941, arriving in time to participate in the Operation Crusader advance towards Benghazi. Unfortunately the success of the British ground offensive was short-lived and the Squadron found itself caught up in the mass retreat eastwards towards El Alamein. In May 1942, the Squadron was once again withdrawn from operations, this time to convert to the Martin B26 Marauder. Although the original intention was to resume tactical bombing operations in the new aircraft, the Squadron instead found itself carrying out armed torpedo reconnaissance and naval mine-laying sorties over the Mediterranean.

The 14 Squadron Association's website records:

By June 1942, the Squadron was operating from a desert landing ground near Sollum in Libya and although under frequent attack from low-flying ME 109's this was not the main concern. The Afrika Korps was just about to break through the 8th Army defensive line adjacent to, and around, Tobruk. Soon enough the whole of the front totally collapsed, leaving all squadrons operating in that area, in danger of being quickly overrun, and their aircraft destroyed. In the absence of any specific instructions from HQ, the CO of 14 Squadron decided that all Squadron aircraft should take off immediately and fly east until they found a landing-strip that could accommodate them as near as possible to the RAF HQ at Burg-el-Arab.

The Squadron was located at Landing Ground (LG) 116, about 12 miles west of Fuka Egypt. It was quickly evacuated when the Axis forces over-ran the area and the Squadron withdrew to Qassassin, Egypt. The Squadron continued to fly missions against the enemy. On 13 June 1942, Blenheim Z6044 took off to participate in night landing practices; aboard were RAF Sgt CM Leaver (Pilot), RAF Sgt H Powell (Observer) and Flt Sgt RJ Hehir.

Whilst the training was in progress a local air raid warning was received. The pilots of the airborne aircraft were ordered to circle and close in. Blenheim Z6044 was reported missing and failed to return to base; it may have been shot down over the sea, but nothing further is known about the aircraft and its crew and it was officially recorded in 1948 that the crew had no known grave. The men's names are inscribed on the El Alamein Memorial. The Victor Harbor Times edition of 26 June 1942 reported Flt Sgt Hehir missing.

Robert's younger brother, Kenneth John Hehir (born 24 July 1920) had earlier enlisted in the Royal Australian Navy on 27 September 1937 at the age of 17. He served on various ships until he was discharged on 23 July 1950.
